The Tulsa Race Riot, as it came to be known, was one of the most heinous acts of racial violence in American history. Over a span of 16 hours, the mob burned and looted over 1,250 homes and businesses, leaving 300 people dead and thousands homeless. The violence was fueled by a false accusation against a young black man, Dick Rowland, who was accused of assaulting a white woman.

The Devastation of Greenwood

Greenwood, a thriving community of nearly 10,000 African Americans, was the heart of Black entrepreneurship and culture in Tulsa. It boasted a thriving business district, a hospital, a library, and schools. The community had been built through decades of hard work and determination, and its destruction in a single night was a devastating blow.

The loss of life and property was immense. Homes were burned to the ground, businesses were looted, and personal belongings were destroyed. Families were torn apart as loved ones disappeared or were killed. The community was left in ruins, both physically and emotionally.

The Aftermath: Fear, Injustice, and Silence

In the aftermath of the riot, the city of Tulsa responded with a mix of shame and denial. Martial law was imposed, and arrests were made, but the majority of the white rioters were never prosecuted. The victims of the riot were left to fend for themselves, with little assistance from the government or the white community.

For decades, the Tulsa Race Riot was swept under the rug, a shameful chapter in American history that few dared to discuss.
