The post-2003 Iraqi Army emerged from the ashes of the former Iraqi military, which was dissolved in the wake of the US-led invasion. The new Iraqi Army was tasked with the daunting mission of securing a country torn apart by war and sectarian violence. In this article, we will explore the identity of the new Iraqi Army and the challenges it faces in the information age.

The New Iraqi Army: A Force in Transition

The new Iraqi Army is a complex and multifaceted organization. It is composed of a mix of former Iraqi military personnel, new recruits, and members of the various armed groups that emerged during the post-2003 period. This diversity has led to a number of challenges, including:

1. Sectarianism: The new Iraqi Army is not immune to the sectarian tensions that have plagued Iraq for decades. In fact, some critics argue that the army is itself a reflection of Iraq's sectarian divisions.

2. Corruption: Corruption is a major problem in Iraq, and the army is no exception. This can lead to a lack of accountability and a decreased willingness to fight.

3. Lack of training and equipment: The new Iraqi Army has been plagued by a lack of training and equipment. This has made it difficult for the army to carry out its mission effectively.

Despite these challenges, the new Iraqi Army has made significant progress in recent years. The army has played a key role in defeating ISIS and securing Iraq from further sectarian violence. The army has also begun to reform its ranks and improve its training and equipment.

The Information Age and the New Iraqi Army

The information age has had a profound impact on the way that wars are fought. The new Iraqi Army is no exception. The army has embraced social media and other information technologies to communicate with the public and to gather intelligence. The army has also used information technologies to improve its training and operations.
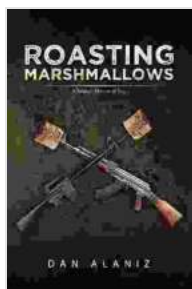

However, the information age also poses challenges for the new Iraqi Army. The army must be careful to protect its sensitive information from cyberattacks. The army must also be aware of the potential for information to be used to spread propaganda and misinformation.
